The School of Humanities and Communication Arts at the University of Western Sydney is a dynamic hub where ideas, culture, communications and technology converge. Our students have unique flexibility and scope to combine theoretical and practical studies across a wide range of related disciplines, such as journalism, photography, performance, music recording, advertising and web design. The School strives to produce graduates who actively produce ideas, enrich cultures, and contribute positively to their workplace or community role. Innovative subjects focus on contemporary debates, perspectives, methods and technologies. Wherever possible, courses include practical training, often through involvement in community and industry-based projects. Our students enjoy the best facilities and technology on offer, with our highly qualified technical staff working alongside academics.
